How To Start Your Own Storytelling Show!

Storytelling is gaining more popularity, and shows are popping up in backrooms of bars, theaters, bookstores, libraries and more. With social media distancing ourselves from one another, a real need to be gathered together in a room, listening and sharing is becoming more important than ever. But where to start?

I have created a workshop that can help you not only begin to craft your own stories, but help set you up to create your own weekly or monthly show in your own library, store, bar or whatever venue you want to start sharing tales with your community.

We cover everything from figuring out what you want to get out of your own show, how to book your guests, the themes and format, all the way to hosting, and getting people to the show. The fun thing about putting up your own production is that it can be as unique and specific as you want it to be. No two shows are alike, and creating a one of a kind format can really draw a community together.

I will come to your venue and teach you and your staff, and whoever you would like to invite along, how to get the ball rolling on your own story telling show. Not only is this a great way to connect and share, but it also can showcase your venue and attract more guests and or customers. And once your event is up and running, I can also plug you into the network of New York storytellers and you can invite people to guest host, or guest speak as well. The community in this state is wonderful and very supportive.

Rory Scholl is a best selling writer on Amazon, a touring storyteller and comic, and hosts one of NYC's longest running shows, The Liar Show. He has created shows and events for Michaels Arts and Crafts, Disney, Cornell University and more. For rates and any other questions, please email rory.scholl@gmail.com